THE wonders of electricity, the latent powers of infaginetism, and the remedial agencies of galtanism, are subjects each having comexion with the other, and in this form of applicability are admirably combined, so that action is at once excited between the metalline compound and the humid animal fibre. Thus, by this simple remedial agent upplied to any part of the system (and herein consists its great superiority over every other galvanic preparation) the stimulus of the galvanic fluid can be irriducted at pleasure to parts which could not so leasily be reached by other agents.

This action of the galvanic fluid, entering readily into bodies, creates no uneassiness, is gentle in its
